SENA JULIA.

Although the clock in the tall tower of St. Mary's had long since tolled out the hour of midnight, the brilliantly lighted windows of the Traveler's club presented a bright contrast to the gloom of the sur-rounding stores, and when a little later the servant extinguished the other lamps, the lights in the smoking room still burned with undimmed radiance,

A little circle of half a dozen men were gathered around the great fireplace in pos-tures more comfortable than elegant, and were listening with breathless interest to a man who was leaning awkwardly against the side of the chimney. His hands were thrust in the pockets of his ill fitting trousers, and his lank figure was emphasized and thrown in relief by the light tints of the wall behind him. He certainly was not a handsome man, yet there was an expression of manliness in the strong face and a suggestion of strength in the broad shoulders and deep chest that never failed to attract and charm one.

A silence now fell upon the little group, and for some moments nothing was heard except the crackling of the pine logs upon the hearth. Then out from the depths of an armchair in their midst came the re-

"I say, Tom, that last story of yours was awfully jolly, and that, but, er-it had no romance in it, you know."

Annerly looked up and smiled.

"But if you really want a love story I'll give you one secondhand," he finished, ap parently unmindful of the interruption: When I was in Geneva some weeks ago I met an old acquaintance and fellow tourist, Graf von Alburg. We took our supper together and grew quite confidential over our cigars and chianti afterward.

At first I was too much absorbed in the flood of recollections which our meeting called up to notice his reserve, but I soon saw that something was welghing upon his mind. Curious to find out what it was, and debating with myself as to whether I should speak to him about it or not, the count suddenly looked up. He gazed at me in some hesitation for a little while,
